

ABSTRACT

To increase the probability of transmission success in data communication systems using forward error correction (FEC), a data file of original data to be transmitted is divided into clusters of blocks of data. Convolution data acquired from another cluster is added to original data of the cluster for encoding to generate parity data. Part of the parity data is added to the original data, and the resultant is transmitted over the network.